As world war approached in the late 1930s, the Douglas company of the USA designed a twin-engine medium bomber / attack aircraft, which would emerge as the "Douglas Bomber 7 (DB-7)", with the US military designation / name of "A-20 Havoc". Thousands were built, many of them being provided to US allies, and the type proving an asset to the Allied cause.

Douglas went on to develop a much-improved follow-on, which emerged as the "A-26 Invader". It went into service too late in the conflict to have much effect in the war, but in the postwar period, as the "B-26", it proved a significant asset in the war in Korea, and served with distinction in Vietnam. This document provides a history and description of the A-20 and A-26 / B-26 Invader.
