Hearing the word “tarantula,” who doesn’t feel a bit squeamish, a little (or a lot!) intimidated? But despite the rumors, the tarantula isn’t dangerous, which is why many people opt to have a pet tarantula. They’re loved for their majestic and beautiful stance, and owners also like they need little maintenance.

They have a nasty bite but it’s pretty harmless. The venom is weaker than that of a bee. A tarantula bite’s red and warm. The spider attacks when it feels threatened. It rubs its hind legs across its body and projects multitudes of tiny hairs at the perceived danger. The barbed hairs pierce the skin. That leads to swelling and itching that can last for weeks.

Like most spider bites, there can also be allergic reactions. Doctors recommend if bitten, get medical help ASAP. First, wash the bite with soap and water. Put ice in a clean cloth and place it on the sting on and off for 10-minute intervals. If you have blood flow issues, reduce the ice placement time to prevent skin damage.

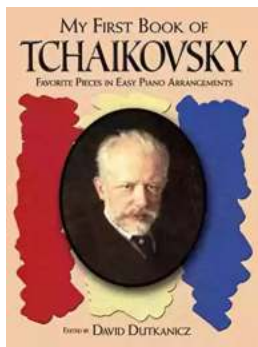

Tarantulas are available at reptile shows, pet stores, with dealers and breeders, and, of course, online. If you’re in the market for an exotic pet, read on to learn about costs, ongoing care, common health issues and more.
