Just 4 months after September 11, 2001, the author traveled to South America with little money, no itinerary and with a near stranger. At that time, she was a 26-year-old trained archaeologist who grew up poor and depressed in Appalachia. This book is part travelogue, part personal essay, part poetry chapbook, part political awakening. The author uses the structure of an archaeological excavation as a metaphor for her process of self discovery and politicization. The writing is both deeply personal, exploring themes of love, loss, longing and richly textured, breathing life into the mythic landscape and the people who've inhabited it for the last 1000 years.

This is a unique voice and one that is not often heard in the public sphere; a young, poor, yet educated woman with a radical political perspective shaped in the fire of the early George W Bush years when the anti-globalization movement was still strong and thriving. The pace and nature of the changes in the political landscape since then have been shocking.

If you're a young woman struggling to make sense of your life and desires, or anyone else simply interested in a unique ramble through a foreign land, this book is for you.
